The Master of Sports Law & Business at the Sandra Day O'Connor College of Law at Arizona State University is the only graduate program in the country that combines sports law and business. This one-year, 36-credit hour degree is for people who want to master legal principles that impact sports organizations. You do not need to become a lawyer or have a legal background to pursue this degree. Graduates are equipped to understand the regulatory, revenue, and reputational forces at play when solving sports industry problems, both in the US and globally. Fall and spring starts and full or part-time options are available. Students are required to complete a major externship or special project in an area that will assist them in their efforts to land an effective gateway position into the industry. Some MSLB students may also take other law courses that advance their career objectives.
